Water those Seeds of Learning!

A new blog post at www.reflectconnect.weebly.com

Even though research clearly shows that extended professional development is more effective than single workshops, conferences can be exciting and fun.

You can wander into a workshop you never knew you wanted,

visit the exhibits and resources,

see friends and acquaintances you might otherwise not see,

meet new people, and talk shop with people from across the state or country.

But what sticks?

Do those great handouts and freebies sit in a bag?

Are those good intentions to look up the web links ever realized?

What survives the return to regular life?

Sometimes, something from a single workshop can become the seed of new learning and practice, if we take the time and attention to water it.

What have been some of your seeds of learning?
